You must I said it all today. The past week and a half has been a difficult one. At first I thought it was your usual wind down time from having spent the weekend with your father. Then I thought it was the fact that I started to see Michael to close to the time from which your father told you he got married. But then again, he never told you, you just happen to hear people talk. No time went on and your behaviour worsened I began to inquire as to why, what was I missing, was there something I was not seeing or listening to. I spoke with Mrs. Spelen today. During the conversation she said something which struck a familiar's feeling. She said she had a girl friend who had two children, and everytime the children come home it is a trial for her. The reason it is a trial is because visiting dad is all about fun, living with mom it is all about from stuff, because he isn't here for anything else. He is not here for teaching you right from wrong. He's not here to help you grow, let's not here. If you want to be with him and Barbara then make the choice and take it."

I washed the dishes, wiped down the ants, and here I am. And there you are, here you are, where will you go.
